ROYAL NAVAL RESERVE.

FIRST CLASS.—Qualifications—Applicants must not be above 30 years of age. The standard of height has been fixed at 5 ft. 4 in., and the girth round the chest not less than 32 inches. Every applicant must prove at least six years' sea service, within the last ten years, and of these six years service, two years' service at least as able seaman in foreign-going or regular coasting vessels. Six months' service as skipper in first-class fishing vessels may be accepted in lieu of two years' service as able seaman.—Emoluments.—£10 4s, to £10 6s 4d per annum, with suit of uniform every 5 years. (Enrolments for this class have now ceased.)

SECOND CLASS.—Qualifications——Applicants must prove that for three years they have followed a seafaring life either in foreign going, coasting, fishing, or other vessels. Fishermen who regularly follow their calling may be enrolled as such. Age 18 to 30—Emoluments.—£7 2s to £7 2s 4d per annum, with a suit of Uniform Clothing extra. (Enrolments for this class have also ceased.)

Second Class men who are not over 32 years of age may be promoted to the new "Qualified Seamen" class on successfully completing 3 months' training in H.M.Ships on the same condition as men of the "Seamen" Class.

"SEAMEN" CLASS.—Qualifications and Emoluments the same as for Second Class men (old system), except that lads under 21 years are accepted though they have not more than 24 months' previous Sea Service. Men of this class who have completed 28 days' drill and are recommended by the Chief Officer of the Battery may be accepted for three months' Naval training. Upon the satisfactory completion of this, they will —if 20 years old, or on attaining that age, if less,—be promoted to the "Qualified" Seaman class, with retainer and drill-pay the same as for First-class men (old system). If during their subsequent service they complete other two periods of Naval training of three months each, they become entitled to a pension of £12 per annum on reaching 60 years of age.

The first period of Naval training must be commenced before the volunteer is 32 years of age.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

A Bill of Exchange is a written order by one person (the drawer) upon another person or firm (the drawees) to pay at a definite time a definite sum of money. If this order is accepted by the drawee, the bill then becomes valuable, and must be paid first by the drawee (acceptor), and second (if the Bill has been protested for non-payment by the acceptor) by the endorsers or drawer.

NOTES AND BILLS.

Notes and Bills, unless payable "at sight" or "on demand," have (in England) 3 days of grace added to the time they are due; thus, if due 60 days after date, will be payable 63 days after date. Bills drawn on foreign cities are often drawn "at usance," i.e., for the length of time after sight allowed by the law of the place. The days of grace also vary in foreign countries.

TO TELL THE WEIGHT OF CATTLE.

By means of the following table we may with considerable accuracy estimate the weight of cattle without the trouble of putting them upon the steelyard. It is to be observed, however, that in very fat cattle the four quarters will be about one-twentieth more, while in those in a very lean state they will be one-twentieth less than the weights shown.

REGISTERED FISHING BOATS.

Owners and masters of boats used for fishing for purposes of sale must comply with the following rules :—

1. Every boat must be registered, lettered, and numbered, as required by the Sea Fisheries Regulations.
2. The master of every registered Boat must have on board at all times (unless specially exempted by the Board of Trade) the Certificate of Registry.
3. If the Certificate is lost, immediate application must be made for another.
4. The Certificate must be presented to the Fishery Officer, or Registrar, Custom House—a. once a-year for examination and endorsement ; b. on change of master, for same to be noted thereon.
5. On a change of ownership, or on removal to another Collectorship, of any Registered Boat, a fresh Certificate must be applied for, and the former Certificate given up to be cancelled.

Non-Compliance with either of these regulations renders owner and master liable to a penalty not exceeding £20, besides seizure and detention of boat.

NOTES ON THE HERRING FISHING OF 1905.

The fleet employed at the early fishing this year numbered 1815 boats and steamers, against 1586 in 1904, 1627 in 1903, and 1544 in 1902.

A very successful fishing was made at Baltasound, the season's catch being 243,606 crans, valued at £235,696, against 162,466 crans in 1904.

The fishing at Lerwick was prosecuted with uninterrupted success from June till the 23rd of September. The total catch for the season at Lerwick was 276,063 crans, valued at £243,696.

The average price for the season was 18s per cran, against 11s 10d in 1904; 18s 3d in 1903; 18s 4d in 1902; 13s 3d in 1901; 19s in 1900; and 19s 2d in 1899.

The highest individual shot was 188½ crans, landed by a steam drifter. It is estimated that over 300 steam drifters were employed. One of these earned £2100 for the season; and several of the steamers grossed over £1000 for their season's work.

The Sandwick boats averaged £520 for the season—a total of about £12,000, against £9360 in 1904, £8900 in 1903, and £11,500 for 22 boats in 1902.

The season's catch for the whole Islands was 645,834 crans, valued at £576,645, against 543,240 crans in 1904, valued at £320,447.

The total export was—Direct, 708,156 brls; Coastwise, 109,431 brls. Total, 817,587.

The number of shore-workers employed at Lerwick this year was as follows:—Women, 1985; coopers, 340; flitmen, carters, and labourers, 93; salesmen, brokers, and clerks, 65—Total, 2483.

The Heart of a Mother.

By ELIZA J. PETERSON.

SHE, the mother, was standing at the door of her house, watching her little daughter coming up the gaet from school.

She was one of those dainty creatures who seem to be at variance with surroundings of hard labour and coarse fare, yet these had been her surroundings all her life.

You would have wished to see her clothed in soft, dead white, and to frame the small, vivid face loosely in the dark brown hair, drawn back too tightly now to be out of the way. The most beautiful feature in her face was the mouth ; it was at once strong and tender, with sweet, mobile lips.

The child coming towards her was a round little one of five or six, and very strongly resembled her mother.

There were the same daintiness and grace in her movements, and the same lovely, tender mouth, only her hair was fair and curling, while the mother's was soft and dark.

She had been only a few months at school, so she was a very important little person indeed.

"See, midder," she said, holding up a small gilt bound book, "what A'm gotten, an' da minister said I was da boaniest lass ida class,—an' da best speller," she added in an afterthought.

For answer, the mother stooped and kissed her, cheeks, lips, hair and hands.

It was rather a rare relation in which these two stood to each other ; they were much nearer and dearer than the ordinary mother and child are.

In this woman, mother-love was much more discriminating and less instinctive than is usual, and like all her other affections could only attach itself to something her mind was in perfect sympathy with. She had had another child, who died, and for whom she had not felt a tithe of the love she had for this girl.

After her own stunted childhood and youth, this child came like a revelation to her, straight from that wonderland whose beauties she had seen just for an instant.

For this little one, she became again a child herself, and for the first time in her life enjoyed absolute and perfect content and happiness.

"Jove, Mary, what a picture," said a tall, tourist looking man, who, with a lady was coming down the road that lay obliquely past Janet Dalziel's house. "I wish to fortune I had taken Rob with me: the boy would have raved over this place. Here, little one, catch;" and he tossed a coin at her as he passed.

The mother had gone in and little Vaira was standing before the door alone. The coin fell at her feet. She did not pick it up, but drew back with a pretty dignity, and stood staring at the strangers.

The lady smiled and her face was so pleasant that the little one smiled back at her, but still stood with the sixpence at her feet.

"Hullo," said the man in a big voice, "don't you want pennies to buy sweets? I was just giving your wee lassie a sixpence to buy something, but I think she does not want it," he added, as the mother heard the voices and came out.

"He didna gie me it, midder, he jüst flang it at me." Whereat all three laughed.

"May we come in and rest for a minute?" said the lady. "We are waiting for my brother who is fishing in the burn yonder."

They all went into the neat little cottage, and the lady talked to Janet, while her husband amused himself by humming comic airs, and making overtures to little Vaira, who was keeping close by her mother's side.

By and by they saw the angler in the burn below the house fold up his rod, and they rose to go, promising to come along again.

As they went down the road the lady sighed, and her husband stopped his light humming.

"I know what you are thinking, Mary," he said in a softer voice, "How like the little one is."

"Yes, but not so pretty, Oh, no, Robert, not half so pretty; there never was anyone that."

"Perhaps not; I daresay not, but she's very like her all the same."

"What a sweet woman the mother is. How lovely to see them together," and she sighed again.

Next day saw her back in the cottage again, and almost every day for a fortnight she managed to speak with Janet and little Vaira.

Every day she came away with a greater feeling of envy; and at last, as was natural to one whose slightest wish had ever been gratified, the thought came into her mind to ask the mother for her child. Surely the mother would see how advantageous it would be for the girl to be taken from a life of poverty and strait, and have everything money could buy and love devise.

Thus she argued the case to herself, unmindful of the fact that she was sadly unwilling to surrender her child to the keeping of the Supreme Love, and the very fulness of Life.

"She seems a nice little thing; I don't mind," was all her husband said, when she broached the plan to him.

She determined to lose no time, and went to Janet.

It seemed the easiest thing in the world to arrange the whole matter, till she saw the look in the mother's eyes pass from surprise to amazement, and from amazement to blank contempt and refusal.

"Vaira, da bairn, ye're sürely no in airnest, ma'am. Vaira, Vaira," and no words can translate all there was in that name softly repeated.

"It would be such a change for her, from this sort of thing,—pardon me—I only meant we could give her so much. It is impossible not to see that the child is not common, not ordinary; she is rare, very rare, and would you not desire to have her made the most of? My husband is very little at home, and he does not object——"

It was an unfortunate word, and she was not prepared for the flash of anger that flushed the mother's face.

"Object? Object to her? That will do, ma'am. We needna spaek ony maer aboot da maitter."

When she had gone out, Janet stood still with quivering limbs and throbbing heart. Then her eyes fell on a pair of little socks hanging by the chimney side, and she took them down and kissed them, and held them in her hands, and gradually she grew calmer. Yet all the while it was borne in on her, and she knew it as certainly as the mind springs, unresisting, to welcome a great truth, that this was fate for her and the child.

How she had longed for a chance for this little one, a chance such as she had never had, but had dreamed of, and far away from her, perhaps in response to that longing of hers, for who shall tell the compelling power of strong thought! The answer had been shaping itself, and was now come, only she herself had been left out. She did not think all this out clearly, she would not allow herself to do that, but all the day it was with her as a slow rankling undercurrent of thought.

When Vaira came in from school, the old joy of seeing her, and going over all the day's work with her lulled every other feeling to rest, and next day she was glad it rained for that kept the child at home.

She had the little one with her all day. She talked to her, and went over all her little school lessons.

She told her stories, fairy stories, and pretty old tales that children love.

She listened, how she listened, to her winsome, childish talk, and all to still this voice that was growing in her heart.

Day after day the same struggle went on, and every day the mother had a growing sense of yielding.

The end came sooner than she expected. She went ben one night, and as she passed the bed she saw a straw sticking up and tickling Vaira on the neck.

The bed was very neat and dainty, but to the mother's fancy, it had never looked so poor and hard before. She looked around the room, and its poverty seemed to mock her.

She sat down on the kist and with a great effort composed herself to face this question of her child's future.

It ended as might have been expected, and as the mother rose, hours afterwards, cold and rigid, the conviction was forced in on her again, that she had been living inevitably to this, and that she had known all the time what the end would be.

Early next morning she rose, and went to Mrs Henderson's house at Bellevue, where the Burtons lodged, for now it seemed to her as if she could not rest until she had settled everything beyond possibility of recall.

She found Mrs Burton only too willing to close the bargain.

Though a kindly, courteous woman, she could not help betraying the satisfaction she felt at having gained her point, and the mother saw this, and a feeling of impotent anger rose up in her again toward this favoured woman, who was the living hand of fate to take her child from her.

On the following Wednesday the Burtons went away and the child went with them, glad to go to the fairy land the lady had described to her. Janet saw them off, and then went back to her lonely home.

There was no one to whom she could turn for advice, or even speak about her loss; the few remarks on the matter that had reached her ears, had gone like knives to her heart.

Everyone was wondering how she could bear to part with her child; many a mother said this whose idea of love for or duty to their children was, compared with this mother's, as the pale ineffectual light of the moon, matched with the sunrise of a spring morning.

This loss to her was infinitely greater than the loss of a child to an ordinary mother, who would probably be consoled with the very next that was born.

She knew that this separation must mean death to her in a certain degree, death to all those instincts which had been awakened by the coming of this child, and when she with her keenly critical mind examined herself, she thought how little, how very little there was of good in her that had not centred round this one little life. And now it was gone.

But was it not the law of all life that the parent should give her best, and if need were, her life, for the succour and perfecting of the child? And if one were privileged to give more fully than another, surely there would be recompense in the fuller inheritance received by the one for whom such sacrifice was made.

But we do not live long at heights like these, and such thoughts came not often to this poor mother, but they did come sometimes, and helped to bear her through those dark, dark days after Vaira went away.

It happened that among her neighbours was another woman who was also a widow with one child, a boy.

Her name was Agnes. She was a shiftless indolent sort of creature, and had it not been for the kindness of Janet, she must have been in sore want many a time.

Willie, that was Agnes's boy's name, was constantly with Vaira, and it was very pathetic to see the little fellow coming, day after day, to see if she had come back again.

His mother had, as might have been expected, been loud in denouncing Janet for parting with her daughter. "I ken I couldna hae sindered wi my ae bairn," she reiterated scores of times a day to any one who mentioned the subject. "It shaas a' it shü cares. Oh, dear, a dear, an' dey're naen frae dem 'at wad be blyde ta keep dem!"

She tried in every way to throw a slur on this woman who had befriended her, and had dared so much for the sake of duty, partly because she was jealous of what she looked on as the little girl's good fortune in being adopted by the rich people, and partly, perhaps, because she realized in some dim sort of way that Janet cared far more for her child than she did for hers, and that no matter how spitefully she, and others of her kind spoke, this woman's self-sacrificing love raised her far above them all.

In the winter Agnes fell ill, and Janet was often at Brugarth beside her, and to look after her small croft. Her illness was far more obstinate than had been anticipated, and at last it developed into fever, and she required some one to be in constant attendance on her.

Janet had nursed her for two nights, and had gone home for a sleep.

She did not know how long she slept, but when she awoke it was just dusk, and she had an uneasy impression that something had happened.

Then as her eyes became accustomed to the darkness, she made out a small figure standing by the bed, and gave a cry of surprise when she saw that it was Willie.

"What is it, Willie?" she asked, "Is midder ony waur?"

"Yae," he said, "at laest shü canna spaek ta me."

Janet sprang up at once, and set out for Brugarth.

Agnes had seemingly been a little better when she went home, but she knew now that it had been the last feeble flickering up of life, for death was written on her face.

Janet stood for a moment, hardly realising that the woman was dying.

She went near the bed and spoke, but the other made no sign, and a feeling of desperate impatience came over her at her own powerlessness to help.

By and by the dying woman opened her eyes and seemed to be looking for something.

Janet could not at first understand the look, but all at once little Willie came forward to the bedside, and then she knew what the mother had been searching for.

She lay with her eyes fixed on his face, and there was in her look what told of a clearer vision of herself and him than she had ever seen before.

Suddenly a thought, a glorious thought, came into Janet's mind.

She stepped close before the bed, and drew the boy into her arms, and the mother's dimming eyes took a look of measureless content and peace.

For a long time Janet stood with her arms around the child, and, though she did not know it then, she was holding the salvation of her life.

She did not know it then, not, indeed, for many a day.

At first, while Agnes's death and that last look of mother-love were fresh in her memory, the thought of what she had impulsively done gave her unmixed pleasure; for she was fully able to appreciate the beauty of her own action.

But by and by the realities of life dimmed the recollection of this, and she saw that, robbed of its romance, the plain fact stood that she had saddled herself with a growing boy, dependant for food, clothing and schoolng on his adopted mother.

This view of the matter was by no means so attractive, and promised to be much more enduring than the other. There was no fear that she would ever ill-treat or neglect the boy, but she might easily become indifferent to him, for she was not interested in childhood in the abstract.

So in a short time she had settled down into a life of dull routine, like that she had led before the boy came to her.

It was now more than a year since she had given away her own child, and every day she tried to keep that time out of her mind.

One day there was to be a Sunday School picnic, and little Willie was invited, but he would not go without Janet, and she consented to go with him, thinking dully of last year when she had taken Vaira there.

So on the morning of the picnic day, she did her housework and then put on her hat and jacket to go. Willie, too, was dressed, and sat watching her. The jacket she had put on was an old one ; there was no inducement to dress prettily now.

"I wis you wid pit on your boanie frock wi' da glitterin' things ower da sleeves, midder," said Willie. He had always called her midder after Vaira ; his own mother had been "maamie."

"Why, dear ?" she asked, smiling at the strange request.

"It mak's you dat muckle boanier," he said. "I jüst luve you whin you're boanie, an' I heard Jeanie Erter sayin' yesterday 'at you wir turned aafilly slaggid i' your claes sin—sin a while sinsyne—" he finished up hastily.

"Oh, an' düs du tink me boanier ir Jeanie Erter ?"

"My, I tink I dü," with fine scorn. "Shü hes rid hair, an' skaev eën, an' hir face is jüst marlit wi' ferntickles."

Janet laughed, a sudden, hearty laugh, at the droll and accurate description.

"So, dearie, I sall pit on da froak wi' da glitterin' trimmin'."

And as she did so she thought, and all day, and when she came home again, her mind was still uneasily pursuing the line laid down in the morning by the boy's words.

She began by thinking of her clothes, and a feeling, a shame came over her at the thought that, even in this detail, she had been lowering herself.

She did not stop at this but subjected her whole view of life to rigorous scrutiny, and at the end she knew that if Jeanie Erter could have looked below the surface, she might have seen that this slovenliness in dress was but the outward and visible sign of a general lowering of tone, a falling away from the ideal.

A year ago she would have blushed to wear a torn stocking or a soiled apron, and she knew that some day the issues of life would reprove her on far greater matters and leave her abashed and wanting.

From that day she dated a new era in her life, when she did her best to live, wilfully, and with a better knowledge of herself, as she had formerly lived almost by instinct since her child was born.

And slowly as the resolution for this grew in her mind, there came along with it thoughts of the little boy, friendless, and alone, who had led her to it, and her heart went out to him in love and gratitude, and from that moment he was to her as her very own.

And now she could think of Vaira, unrestrainedly and without pain, and gradually the thought was borne in on her that one day she would meet her child again, and they two would be more to each other than ever they had been before.

Many years passed away and little Willie had grown to be a man, and still lived with Janet in the old home.

She had not changed much during the years. Her face was no longer in the bloom of youthful beauty, and her soft dark hair was much thinner now, but she was still lovely to look upon.

In her eyes was the same intense eager look as in the old days, a look of the most winning sympathy.

It was on just such a lovely afternoon as that on which our story opened, and Janet was standing by her door watching the "Earl" gliding to her moorings in the voe below.

Not once in all the years that had passed had she missed to watch for her coming, but no word or sign had ever reached her from the distant city where her child had gone.

She could see little groups of passengers on the steamer's decks, and recognized several perple who annually made holiday in Breawick.

Willie was at the pier, and when he came in she asked him of the arrivals. "Oh, just da öswil folk, da Frasers, an' da minister ta Bellevue, and Mr Watson an' his daughters ta' da Manse. Oh, an' I never minded; dey wir a young man 'at cam, he gude ta Bellevue tü, an' he wis axin' da men ida boat if dey could tell him o' ony ene at could ging wi' him an' shut seals, an' idder things 'at he's wantin' ta dü, an' da men bade him tak' me, so if you tink I can win, A'm gaain da moarn."

"Yae, ging de wis, bit fir ony sake tak care wi' da banks an' yon guns o' yours. Whats' da man's name? kens du?"

"I tink he said it wis Burton."

At the sound of that name she had not heard for years, Janet's heart seemed to stand still.

Then, before she could dare to form a hope that this was other than a coincidence, she pulled herself up sharply, chiding herself for attaching any importance to a very common name.

So next day, Willie set out with the stranger.

From the first they took to each other wonderfully, these two young men. Willie was a crack shot, and knew every inch of banks round the place.

For weeks they went out every day, and many were the birds and beasts that fell to their redoubtable guns. One day Mr Burton said, "Do you think there is any chance of my getting an otter, Will? The fact is I want an otter, at least the skin," and here he turned away and began to blush furiously. "There is someone in the south I want to give it to for a—well for a muff, in fact."

"A otter, oh, I hae nae faer o' gettin' dat," said Willie easily. "Bit ye'll hae ta come doon da nicht laet an' we'll bait da traps."

In due time the otter was captured and as the two young men got it on the sand regarding it with joyful pride, Willie drew his hand over the sleek brown body and said, with a shy smile at the other.

"Widna I laek ta see da lady 'ats ta wear dis."

"Would you, though? By Jove, no wonder, if you only knew how pretty she is. Do you know, Will, why I like so much to come to your house? It's because your mother reminds me so of her. She is unaccountably like her, and yet I cannot tell how; I think it must be something in her manner."

"Oh, maybe," said Willie absently, calculating the chances of more otters.

"Do you know," Mr Burton went on, "I have often felt as if I should like to tell you all about it, about her and myself and all."

"If ye laek ta tell me, A'll be very gled ta listen, an' ye can depend, naething 'll ging ony farder."

"I know. Well, about her you know there is'nt really much to tell.

We're not brother and sister, although we were brought up to regard each other so. My mother adopted her when she was quite little, and I never knew where she came from nor who her parents were. My father died soon afterwards, and I fancy my mother meant to tell us both, but she too died very suddenly and we knew nothing more."

"Can shü no mind onything hersel?"

"Not much. She can remember her mother, and a little boy who used to play with her, but what of that when we do not know where she came from."

Willie was silent.

"Of course, we have not seen much of each other," Mr Burton went on. "I have been abroad a good deal, and I only came home for good after my mother's death, and—and you can guess the rest, I think. But she does not want me; I know she does not. She is a strange girl. I do not think anyone of us understands her."

Still Willie made no answer, and by and by they rose to go. Just down below Janet's house Willie said, "Mr Burton, I wad laek you ta promise me something. I wad lack if ye wad wraet and tell me hoo ye get on."

"Oh, certainly, I mean to write and I do hope I shall have some good news to tell you, but, I don't know."

There was not a doubt in Willie's mind that this girl of whom Mr Burton spoke was really Janet's daughter.

He did not know at first how to treat the matter.

He thought of telling Janet what he had heard, and leaving her to act as she thought best. Then he remembered how she had told him of her binding promise to have no communication with the child. Could he give her the pain of putting her daughter within her reach, with this barrier between them, a barrier that, he knew, the mother, with her high sense of honour, would never break through? At last he made up his mind to say nothing, but to wait the news that might come from Mr Burton.

So for the next few months letters came and went with unfailing regularity, and at last one bore the joyful news that everything had been satisfactorily arranged, and that Mr Burton was about to take his fiancee on a yachting trip. The letter contained further an invitation to Willie to come away for the voyage with them. Mr Burton could easily engage him as a hand on the yacht, and they would be able to go over again the pleasant time they spent in old Shetland. Willie was only too glad to go. If this girl really were Janet's daughter he would persuade Mr Burton to come to Shetland and try to arrange some means by which all those people would be made known to each other, and this woman, who had been more than a mother to him all these years, should see that he had not been entirely unworthy of her love and care.

The "Sunbeam" was midway between Liverpool and the Isle of Man. On her decks were seated a merry party consisting of Mr Burton, his aunt, and her two daughters.

Presently a young girl joined them. Mr Burton had been guilty of a little pardonable exaggeration when he had spoken to Willie of her beauty a few months before. She was not a beauty by any means, but her face had a quiet seriousness that was very winsome.

As she came forward she noticed one of the sailors working a short distance from where the others were seated. She had not seen the man before, but something in his face made her look at him again.

The merry chatter of the girls did not interest her greatly, and she began vaguely to wonder how the younger Miss Burton's curls and frills would look after a few hours' wind and rain.

She had not solved this problem when the others went below.

She was glad they went, for it left her free to think, and she wanted to think just then, and stangely enough the face of this sailor would come into her thoughts. Somehow she at once associated him with a stretch of yellow sand and high rocks.

She lay back in her chair and tried to think.

She had made many yachting trips before, but she was quite sure she had not seen him then.

Again there rose before her a shining sea-shore and a background of black rocks.

"Excuse me, I have been wondering where I have seen your face before. I know I have seen you before."

The man rose with a start and the rope he was splicing slipped from his hands. His face was flushed and he stood still and stared at the speaker without a word. She, too, rose; that mental picture was strong before her and there was a piteous eagerness in her voice as she asked, "Who are you?"

"A'm Willie."

And like a flash she repeated the name as if it had struck a chord in her own mind.

Then she said, and her voice was low and intense, "You are Willie; I remember you. Can you tell me who I am?"

"Yes."

"Then do it. At last, at last."

. . . . . .

The "Sunbeam" did not visit the Isle of Man, for the lady at whose service she was suddenly took a fancy to see the Western Highlands again, where she had spent some months a few years before.

So to the Highlands they went, and on the second morning after their arrival, her place at the breakfast table was empty. She was gone.

On her dressing-table they found a note. "Dear Rob, I am going away. I cannot explain. If you will, forgive me, and wait; if you cannot, try to forget me, but in any case do not attempt to find out where I am, and tell no one."

Great was the consternation and grief of the party when this was found. No one could imagine any intelligent reason for the girl's flight, yet everyone had a dozen different theories to advance. The elder Miss Burton said it was tragic, and only abandoned this idea on being told by her sister that a tragedy ended with a death. In her, the informant's opinion, the whole thing was "like a novel." The person who took the calmest view of the matter was Mr Burton himself. "She will come back to me; I know she will. Does she not say 'wait.' I will wait. I know she will come back, and I should be utterly unworthy of her if I did not trust her. She will come back."

So to the skipper of the yacht he simply said that Miss Burton had been called away on very urgent business, and that the yacht would not go to the Isle of Man and Ireland as arranged.

This was told to the crew and of course was accepted, but there was one who wondered.

When the men were paid off at Liverpool, Willie went home. His little plan had quite failed, for Mr Burton made no further mention of his marriage, nor did he ask him to stay any longer in the south. So the two parted, and neither felt free to share with the other knowledge that might have ended their waiting at once.

A week later Willie was back in Shetland. He went home by the mail-gig on Friday, so it was late in the evening when he reached Breawick. He had meant his home-coming to be of a very different description, and he was bitterly disaopointed. How could he bear to meet the patient longing eyes of the waiting mother, and not tell her all he knew? He looked to the little cottage standing dark against the sunset. She was not at the door as was her custom when he was coming home. There was a light in the little butt window. As he passed he looked in, and a sight met his eyes that made him fairly gasp with astonishment.

Next moment he laughed, a low laugh of delight, blent with wonder at his own stupidity in not knowing this before. In a chair by the side of the fire sat Janet, and on the floor at her feet, with her head resting on her mother's knees, was a fair-haired girl, who looked like a little child, tired, resting after a long day's play.

"And you will come, soon, mother?"

"Yae, dear."

"And remember in a few years you are to come altogether and live with us, mother."

"Yae dear, bit it canna be till Willie hes somebody ta luke efter him. Shürely I can never dü eneugh fir him fir a' 'it he's düne fir me."

"But we shall come home every summer, every summer and stay till almost winter, mother."

"Yae, dear, an' du'll wraet every day ta midder."

"Yes, yes, yes, every day."

"I can never feel at du's onywise removed frae me noo, no if du'd been gain' ta da idder side o' America."

"Removed! I am not removed from you. What are a few hundred miles to love such as yours and mine, my mother?"

"Blissin' be wi' dee, jewel."

"Good-bye, my own mother."

His One Failing.

A Shetland Tale

By JOHN NICOLSON, Author of "Tales of Thule."

ON the particular Sunday eight years previous to the event in which we are interested, when the purpose of marriage between Lowrie Johnson and Jessie Twatt was proclaimed, the good people of Bardister had made various comments as they walked home in little groups from the kirk at Skatness; and from their opinions, expressed somewhat freely, it could be gathered that there were very few who were inclined to regard the intended union favourably.

Jessie was a native of Bardister, while Lowrie belonged to a neighbouring parish, only he had an uncle who stayed in Bardister, and it was when paying a visit to this relative that he first met Jessie. After that it was noticed that he evinced a much stronger liking for his uncle than he had ever shown before, and came to see him very frequently.

Lowrie was a well-built good looking man; in fact there were some who went the length of calling him a really handsome young fellow. As a seaman he was well liked by every master that he had sailed with, and by his shipmates as well, for he had many good qualities. His one shortcoming was a weakness for strong drink. That he was thoroughly in earnest in his love for Jessie there could be little room for doubt, as it was just as certain that she loved him too.

In spite of what the gossiping public had to say, their courtship progressed. When he went south to sail, he wrote to her regularly from every port, and on his return the following winter the wedding was arranged, but as report had it that he was none steadier in his habits, the folk shook their wise heads, and said that it was very sad to see the misguided girl running on a seen danger, and marvelled that her parents allowed the affair to go on. But Jessie was young, and liked Lowrie too well to give any serious consideration to the future, and besides she fondly imagined—as many more have done—that he loved her too well to do anything to mar their happiness, and that when they were married, and settled in life, things would go on smoothly; so the marriage came off.

The little croft of Collister, which lay on the hillside—a short distance up from Bardister—was vacant, and they went to stay there, but alas for Jessie's fond hopes; everything had not turned out as she had expected. Lowrie had given up sailing south, having bought a share in a big herring boat, and for the first four years of his married life followed the calling of a fisherman. Some seasons he had done fairly well, but there was still strong evidence that he had failed to overcome his weakness. When the boat was fishing at Lerwick, a lot of his earnings was spent in drink, and when he used to come home over Sunday, it was very seldom that he arrived sober.

Had Lowrie lived in a town he would undoubtedly have become a confirmed drunkard, but at Bardister the environment was different. On some Saturday nights, however, when he would stroll as far as "the shop" —as the local general store was termed—he generally returned the worse of drink, and frequently had to be helped home. This state of affairs grieved poor Jessie greatly, and the only thing that helped to brighten her existence was the presence of their boy—"peerie Lowrie"—a bright little fellow to whom the father was also fondly attached.

The fishing had shown signs of falling off, and Lowrie had sold his share in the Bride of Fitful and was back at his old calling, sailing in weekly boats out of Newcastle. The remittances which he sent to his wife were few and far between, but she struggled bravely, laying by carefully what little money she did receive, to pay the rent, and striving by her knitting to provide the necessaries of life.

Lowrie had written that he intended coming home for the winter, and one Friday morning in October he was one of a number of seamen who arrived in Lerwick by the St Giles. He intended leaving for home that same day, but as he was constantly meeting some old chum, and, of course, paying sundry visits to the public houses, it was after mid-day before he made a start, along with two young men belonging to Bardister, and two others who hailed from the northside.

The whole five had taken drink, but to judge by the various tacks which Lowrie made over the road below The Port, it was safe to say that he had taken the most. Drunk as he was, however, he brought up in front of a shop window where some toy ships were displayed, and declared that he must purchase one to the boy. The sight of these had brought to his mind a promise which he had made when leaving home, for peerie Lowrie's greatest object in life was to have a ship which he could sail in the loch behind the cottage. The shopman kindly dismantled the craft, and rolled it up carefully. He then persuaded Lowrie to undo the bag which he was carrying, and the ship was stowed among the clothes.

As the five trudged on over the lonely road which wound its way among the rugged hills, they broke the quiet by singing snatches of sailors' songs, and every now and then the friendly bottle went round. Things passed off very smoothly until the "Windy Grind" was reached, when one of the northside men made some very innocent remark which Lowrie in his semi-stupified condition misconstrued as being a disparaging statement regarding Westside men in general. This was more than he could tolerate, and in the interests of his native parish, he planted a rather unsteady blow on the offender's nose, and the latter immediately retaliated by landing Lowrie in a puddle at the side of the road.

At this juncture their companions thought fit to interfere, and as they had now to go in different directions, the combatants were led off, but they contrived to keep up a very unfriendly communication until a hill intervened, and they could no longer see each other.

It was dark by the time the trio reached the dykes of Bardister, and there Lowrie took leave of his companions, and went in the direction of Collister. Left to himself he found the hill somewhat difficult to negotiate, and after floundering about for a while, he felt so puffed out that he found it necessary to take a rest, and setting the bag up against a stone, he squatted down among the heather, and in a short time was fast asleep.

In his slumbers he must have dreamed about the recent quarrel, for he suddenly got to his feet swearing bitterly. The moon was peeping from behind a cloud at the time, and in the dim light his half conscious gaze took in the long grey bag standing against the stone. It was the Northside man without a doubt, and Lowrie's one thought was revenge. He seized hold of it and dashed it to the ground, and then began a most unmerciful pommelling on the luckless clothes bag, until utterly exhausted he had to desist, and with his supposed vanquished adversary underneath him, he dropped off to sleep again.

It was grey daylight when he awoke; now sober, but half-dead with cold. He managed to get the bag on his back, and crept up the hill towards the house. Jessie was up when he arrived, and very quickly realised what was the matter. She made ready a cup of tea, and when he had put on dry warm clothes, she got him persuaded to go to bed.

It was well out through the following day before he awoke, and when he got up there was no one in the house, for Jessie was looking after the cattle, and peerie Lowrie was at school.

A little later the boy burst in to the house eagerly, for he had met his mother and she had told him of his father's arrival. Lowrie took him up in his arms and kissed him tenderly, and when he had put him down again, the boy cautiously asked if he had remembered to bring the ship.

With sinking heart Lowrie opened the bag, only to find as he expected that the noble vessel had been completely wrecked in that fierce encounter on the hillside.

"Oh, faider," said the boy, as he viewed the wreckage, "wha's brocken my ship?"

It was a sad voice that spoke, and its sadness went straight to the father's heart, and made him feel as he had never felt before.

"I done it, boy," he said bitterly, "an' I'm sorry for it, bit it's a' through dis cursid drink, an' wi' God's help, it's da last drop 'at enters my mooth." And since then Lowrie has kept his promise.

The Custom of Opgestry.

THE law or custom of opgestry is defined by Hibbert as "empowering the possessors of udal lands, with the consent of their heirs, to dispose of their patrimony to any person who would undertake their support for life. Such disposers were then received into the house of their maintainer under the name of his opgesters; whence the law by which estates could be alienated from the udal-born for such a purpose was named the custom of opgestry." Hibbert annexes a deed of opgestry of date 1602; and a Charter of Upgestrie, dated 1581, is given in the Maconochie Collection, No. xiii. The deed in the present collection (No. VII., A.D, 1547) is earlier than either of these; and though not exactly a deed of opgestry, it bears to be with the consent of the mother of the granter, who is declared to be "upgaster" to the said granter, and it apparently is a conveyance of the land acquired from the upgaster. It thus distinctly, though only incidentally, exemplifies this peculiar feature of ancient northern law.

Fight with Invaders from the Lews.

THIS incident, which is stated to have occurred in the reign of Queen Mary, is related in a MS. "Description of Dunrossness, by Mr James Kay, minister thereof" (from 1682 to 1716), contained in volume 13. 2. 8. of the manuscript collection in the Advocates' Library.

I can hear of no Battles fought in this place [Dunrossness]; only here (as in other places) they have not wanted Feuds, which have occasioned some skirmishes. One in the reign of Queen Mary between Oliver Sinclair of Brow in this parish and Hutchen of the Lews, the occasion whereof was this. William of the Lews having married an Heretrix in this Country, Oliver Sinclair being Fowd or Governor of the Country, feared lest William [Macleod] of the Lews, being a great man, should possibly have opposed him; therefore he concluded to make him away, to which he was not a little instigated by his wife. And because he could not avowedly effectuate his murderous design, he resolves at length upon this expedient, that he would go, and, in show of friendship, visit him, which done, under pretext of intimate Comradeship, he would exchanges pages with him. In the meantime he had conduced his page, thus exchanged, to kill him, which he did that same night. In revenge of whose death, Hutchen of the Lews, brother to the deceased William, made several inroads into this Country; but his people here having advertisement given them by some of the inhabitants of the Fair Isle whom they had conduced to that purpose, for the first two attempts he prevailed not. But the third time he overtook the Fair Isle boat before she landed and put the boatmen to the edge of the sword. Which done, he landed at Gairth Banks without opposition, and made a great slaughter, especially about Quendale, a quarter of a mile from Brow, where in one morning fell above sixty souls. But Oliver himself fled to Sumburghhead, where being hotly pursued he leapt over, but eventually falling upon a bit of green in the clift of a rock, he escaped without more prejudice but the loss of an eye, and Hutchen is by Queen Mary commanded back.

Local tradition has preserved emphatically the memory of incursions by the Lewismen. Scenes of conflict with them are still pointed out on the Links of Sumburgh, and at the sandy shore at Scousburgh where the "Lewis Scords," so called, are still shown. The present encounter, inspired by revenge, appears to have taken place at Quendale, in the same parish of Dunrossness; but the incursions were frequent, and spread over a lengthened period, and the accounts as reported at the present day are mixed up in some confusion. So early as in 1461 the ravages of these marauders formed the subject of complaint by Bishop William of Orkney to the King of Denmark and Norway. The story here given, though not corroborated by any known record, may be supposed to approximate to accuracy, as the alleged occurrence was at no great distance of time from that of KEY, who recorded it.

Oliver Sinclair of Brew was the Great Fowde of Shetland who entertained Bothwell in 1567 on his strange meteoric visit to the northern islands after his flight from the side of Queen Mary on the field of Carberry Hill. The family of Brew was at one time of first consideration in Shetland, possessing extensive properties not only in the south end of the country, but also in the island of Unst and elsewhere. They seem to have gone rapidly down after the time of this Oliver, but representatives remained into the last century, when the succession passed to the family of Mr Grierson of Quendale.

Slaughter of Richard Leask.

THE following is quoted from the same manuscript as the preceding:—

Not long after this [the incursion of the Macleods of the Lews] happened another [skirmish] between Henry Sinclair of Sandwick and Henry Dillidasse, occasioned by some little prejudice done in the House of Brow to the servant of Henry Sinclair. In revenge whereof, being instigated by his wife, Henry Sinclair conduced his man to stab Richard Leask, son-in-law to Oliver Sinclair of Brow, which he did as he was entering the door of the Church, and so he died. Henry Dillidasse, son-in-law to the deceased Richard, being in Orkney at the time, and hearing of the Murder, went over to Caithness, and assembled some of his Friends to revenge his father-in-law's death, with whom he came over to Zetland. But Henry Sinclair, with some of his friends and followers, being fled north the length of Laxfoord [Laxfirth] he pursued after them, and they not advertised of his arrival were returning southward. So they met upon a Moor between Laxfoord and Lerwick, where at first meeting Henry Dillidasse desired them to surrender the Murderer, on whom he might inflict condign punishment for his crime, promising that upon so doing there should be nothing but peace and friendship betwixt them; which the other refusing to do, they prepared for a skirmish, in which Henry Dillidasse slew the Murderer with the shot of a pistol, and the rest were forced to flight. Henry Sinclair himself narrowly escaping, and one Sinclair of Burra swimmed over to Trondra, near a mile of Sea. In this skirmish several fell on both sides.

This Richard Leask ("Richard Lesk") who was murdered at the door of the Cross Kirk of Dunrossness, may have been the same Richard who was appointed by Sir David Sinclair to be one of his executors in his testament of 1506 before referred to. Sir David bequeathed to him 20 merks of land in Cwndistay [Brindista?] and a ship—my Inglis, i.e., English schipe with all geir." The story of the murder is nowhere else recorded, and no knowledge of Leask otherwise is preserved in the islands.

The above incidents (V. and VI.) I printed for the first time in "Mill's Diary," issued by the Scottish History Society in 1889. The work is not available for general circulation, which justifies the reproduction of the stories here.

Earl Patrick: A Scene in Scalloway Castle, c. 1600.

THE castle of Scalloway was built by this tyrannous Earl in the year 1600 (as also, no doubt, in preceeding and subsequent years). His compelling the natives to labour at its erection, without meat, drink, or pay, is preserved on record as in tradition. The only incident hitherto known connected with the building is the alleged scene between the Earl and Pitcairne, the minister of Northmavine, when the wrath of the former was aroused by the minister's pointing out his enormities, and suggesting an inscription for the doorway which bore an insinuation of the instability of a house built upon a sandy, that is, an unworthy, foundation. The inscription, now much worn, is quoted on page 165. The castle has long been a roofless ruin.

In "Morison's Decisions," vol. xix. p. 16, 481, under the head Vis et Metus, a case "Earl of Orkney against Vinfra," reported in Haddington's MS. vol. i., No. 1074, is thus quoted, under date 21st February, 1606:—

The Earl of Orkney charged Andrew Vinfra to pay to him 2000 merks. He suspended that the Contract was null, because it was extorted by fear and dead-dome; because the Earl having caused send this Vinfra to him to his Castle in Zetland, presented to him this Contract subscribed by the Earl, and commanded him to subscribe it, which the said Andrew Vinfra refused, wherewith the said Earl was so offended, that with terrible countenance and words, and laying his hand upon his whinger, he threatened with execrable oath to bereave this Vinfra of his life, and stick him presently through the head with his whinger, if he subscribed not, and so for just fear he being compelled to subscribe it, the same was null. It was excepted by the Earl against the reason that the same was not relevant to stay the execution of his decreet; which the Lords repelled, because it was only a decreet of registration of the Contract by compearance of a procurator. Next he alleged that the same could not come in the way of exception, especially because there was no fact nor deed libelled, but only boisterous words which could not be thought just fear, chiefly seeing he offered him to prove that the said Andrew Vinfra, by his missive letter, had offered to contract upon those conditions before the date thereof. The Lords found the exception of fear very relevant and sufficiently qualified, but in respect of the answer founded upon the missive letter, they ordained to produce the same before interlocutor.

Nothing further is reported of the case, but it is an interesting record of a characteristic incident within the castle of the rapacious Earl, and of courage on the part of an islander in refusing tamely to submit to the tyrant. It is, moreover, worthy of note that at this period the protection of the law was available against even one so powerful as the Earl, who was obliged, like other litigants, to refer his claim to the Supreme Court, with, as it would appear, only indifferent success.

In the name of the defender we are warranted in discarding a printer's error, and in place of "Vinfra" to read Andrew Vmfra, a name of some historical interest. There is little doubt that this was the Andrew Umfra who conveyed to Dunkirk the shipwrecked seamen of the ship of Admiral Don Juan Gomez de Medina of the Spanish Armada, wrecked in 1588 on the Fair Isle. He was a master mariner, probably owner of his own ship, and possessed of some landed property as well. In 1634 his granddaughters, Jean and Janet Umphray, were served heirs to him, as appears from the following entries in the Retours:—

Nov. 26, 1644.

JEANNA UMPHRAY, hæres pro portionaria Andreæ Umphray nautæ incolae villæ Scallowaybankis: proavi, —in 27 mercatis terrarum de Berrie: E. 2 lie leispundis butiri, &c.—1½ mercata terræ in Houll; E. 3 mercatæ butiri, &c.—feudifirmarum: omnibus infra parochiam de Tingnall et dominium de Zetland. xix. 106.

Nov. 26, 1644.

JONETA UMPHRAY, hæres portionaria Andreæ Umphray nautae, incolae villæ de Scallowbankis, proavi —in terris prædictis. xix. 107.

The designation here given—sailor, master mariner, indweller in the town of Scallowaybankis—entirely corresponds with what we should expect to be a natural position for the defender. He was besides a person of some realised means, owner of the small property of Berrie, sufficient to incite the cupidity of the Earl.

Though Umfra's male line failed, his succession having thus been taken up by his granddaughters, collaterals of the family have maintained their position in the islands to the present day, e.g.:—

1634—Patrick Umphray of Sand.
1697—James Umphray of Voe.
1698—Barbara Umphray, relict of Thomas Cheyne.
1704—Patrick Umphray of Sand.
1708—John Umphray of Asta.
1721—Laurence Umphray of Voe.
1735—Andrew Umphray, dispones lands of Stove to James Mitchell of Girlsta.
1743—Laurence Umphray of Voe.
1772—Lilias Umphray of Stapness.

In 1837 the late Mr Andrew Umphray was infeft by precept of Chancery as heir of John Umphray of Asta, his great-great-grandfather, in lands in the parish of Sandsting. The lands of Asta (24 merks) with the Holm of Asta, etc., were originally acquired by John Umphray in Scalloway, and Ingane Adamsdochter, his spouse, in 1586. As appears from the Register of the Great Seal, a Charter of confirmation was granted, on the 4th of October of that year, to the sale of the property to them by Magnus Halcro of Burgh, precentor of Orkney, with the consent of the Bishop.

Sole Agent in the East of Scotland for the POTASH SYNDICATE.

Potash Manuring.

KAINIT. KAINIT.

Sulphate of . . . . Muriate of Potash.

FARMERS are STRONGLY RECOMMENDED to SOW KAINIT in AUTUMN, and find by actual experience that it produces far more effect than Spring-sown Kainit upon the succeeding Crop.

The above Manures afford the Cheapest means of supplying Potash, which is essential for all Crops.

The Heavier and Better the Crop required, the more Potash must be supplied, and from the annual increasing consumpt of POTASH SALTS within the last few years, Scottish Farmers are now awakening to the great value which POTASH plays in all complete Manures.

In the year 1897, Scotland only consumed 8500 tons of POTASH SALTS, whereas this year over 32,000 tons have been consumed, but even this quantity will increase by leaps and bounds when Farmers throughout Scotland become fully alive to the great benefits to be derived from liberal use of POTASH SALTS, in combination with Nitrogeneous and Phosphatic Manures.

Increased Potash Manuring means Increased Profits.

PAMPHLETS, &c., may be had GRATIS from

Would respectfully call attention to their Large and Varied Stock of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, and Electro Plate,

confident that they are offering to the public FIRST-CLASS GOODS at prices second to none for Cheapness, when quality is considered.

LADIES' AND GENTLEMEN'S

English, American, and Swiss Watches, at Prices to suit the circumstances of all.

Gold and Silver Hall-Marked Jewellery.

A large Assortment of Gold and Sterling Silver Goods, consisting of Alberts, Studs, Sleeve Links, Pendants, Seals, Medals, Pens, Pencils, Brooches, Ear-rings, Scent Bottles, Ladies' Chains and Alberts, etc.

People are often tempted now-a-days by seductive advertisements to purchase their Watches, Clocks and Jewellery from large city firms on the instalment principle. We can assure the public that they have to pay smartly for the privilege.

It cannot be supposed that firms who advertise in almost every paper in the United Kingdom can do so without laying the expense incurred thereby on the goods they sell. Besides, the law and court expenses incidental to a business principle of this kind, compel them to charge sometimes as high as one hundred and fifty per cent. profit on the goods offered for sale. That is, an article costing somewhere about £1 must be sold at £2 10s before a profit can be made. They must lay on this profit if they are to make ends meet after rents, advertising and law charges are paid. We cannot blame them, but we do blame the system.

The Country retailer having no thousands of pounds to pay out in wholesale Empire advertising, in extortionate city rents, in never-ending law charges, can and does meet his customers on a much more satisfactory and equitable principle. The Country retailer, knowing nothing of these charges, can price his goods at a far lower rate, and local competition compels him to do so. We are in the position to sell as cheaply as any jeweller can in the United Kingdom. Having none of the enormous expenses of City firms, we can offer goods at lower prices.

We have boys' watches from 7s 6d. Gent's watches at all prices, in nickel and silver.

We can specially recommend a very fine movement in Silver Cases at 33s and 35s, or in Nickel Cases at 21s.

I had a weakly Yearling troubled with Scouring. I gave one Ball at two different times, and the result was a perfect cure.—S.CORY.

And for Scouring in Calves and Lambs they are almost infallible.

They restore the healthy functions of the Digestive Organs, fortify and strengthen the constitution, give tone and vigour to the whole system, and prevent injurious results of over exertion or improper feeding. Bullocks fatten much faster by occasionally having a Ball, and by their frequent use Young Animals grow to a larger size and come to earlier perfection with the same quantity of food.

"CALLER HERRIN'" CUTCH.

THE REGISTERED TRADE MARK of the FISHWIFE,

IT IS THE PUREST CUTCH.

IT IS THE STRONGEST AND RICHEST CUTCH.

Perfectly Regular in Quality: Never Varies.

THE BEST CUTCH PRODUCED.

THE LOWEST IN PRICE OF ALL IMPORTED CUTCH.

This Cutch gives a rich, clear brown colour to nets, sails, and lines, and is now recognised in all fishery districts as a Safe and Sure Net Preserver, and the best value in the Market.

It is so rich in Tannin, which is the principle in Cutch that preserves nets, that in the process of Barking a less quantity is required, and should only be used. Some fishermen allege that while "Caller Herrin'" is all that can be desired for new nets, it makes old nets hard. But this is obviated by using one-fifth less of "Caller Herrin'" than any other Cutch, and an important saving is also thus effected, in addition to the further advantage of the low price at which "Caller Herrin'" is sold.

"Caller Herrin'" is Guaranteed Absolutely Pure Cutch, and may be had from local dealers in Blocks, Quarter-Blocks, Cakes, and Tablets.

PATENT COMPRESSED ROOFING FELT,

SCOTCH MAKE.

Much better than the Irish Article, and it is absolutely Damp-Proof, and is also the only Felt which has not to be tarred when put on. Any handy man can put it on.

Manufactured by C. DAVIDSON & Sons, Limited, ABERDEEN.

PRICES

No. 1. THICK.....8d	per lineal yard,	32 inches wide,	and	25 yards long.
No. 2. MEDIUM....6d	Do.,	do.,	do.,	do.
No. 3. THIN 5d	Do.,	do.,	do.,	do.
No. 4. MEDIUM...6½d	Do.,	36	do.,	15 do.

Nos. 2 and 3 are used for very Temporary Roofs, and also for going under Slates. Sold in Rolls 25 yards long. Each yard bears the Trade Mark of a Thistle in a Triangle.

SPECIAL QUOTATIONS FOR LARGE QUANTITIES, IN ROLLS, 25 Yards Long, 32 Inches Wide.

PATENT ANTI-DAMP FOUNDATION FELT.

This Felt is specially made in various widths to suit walls of different thicknesses. It is absolutely water-tight, and being pliable is not liable to crack, if the wall subsides at all, as hard pitch sometimes does.

It is easily applied, and prevents with absolute certainty any damp from ascending the Wall.

Sold by all large Ironmongers and Dealers in Builders' Materials in the following widths:—5, 10, 15, 20, 25, and 32 inches, at 10d per square yard (with discount to dealers). To be had from all WHOLESALE IRONMONGERS in the KINGDOM, and JAMES FLEET & SONS, Kirkwall, and HAY & Co., Merchants, Lerwick.

SANITARY CEDAR FELT (Patented).

FOR LAYING UNDER CARPETS, FLOORCLOTHS, &c.

THIS FELT is really the only one in the market which is impervious to Moths and other Insects. It retains for years the aroma of the Cedar Wood, the essence of which is incorporated in its substance. Makes the Carpet last twice as long, by protecting it from hard uneven flooring. Prevents Draught and Dust coming through seams and cracks in the floor, thus keeping the Room warm. Lies quite flat, requires no fastening down, may be taken up and re-laid when necessary. Makes the Carpet feel much thicker and softer to the Tread; an ordinary Carpet with two layers of under-Felt will feel almost like a Turkey Carpet. Supersedes the Brown Paper sometimes used, which CRACKLES, and is no protection to the Carpet, being as hard as the flooring.

The Orkney Herald,

PUBLISHED ON WEDNESDAY,

Is one of the best-established and most popular journals in the north of Scotland, and is specially noted for the completeness with which it chronicles all important events, whether occurring at home or abroad, the accuracy of its agricultural and market reports, and the large extent to which it employs the telegraph in the supply of early and reliable information.

The Orkney Herald has for Forty-five years been acknowledged to be the leading newspaper in the county, and having the largest circulation north of Inverness, is unquestionably the best advertising medium in the district.

DISTINCTIVE SYSTEM

ASSURANCE.

LOW PREMIUMS. LOW EXPENSES.

A greatly larger original Assurance—generally £1200 or thereby is secured from the first for the same yearly Premium as would elsewhere assure (with Profits) £1000 only—with the prospect to those who prove good lives (for whom exclusively the Surplus is reserved) of eventually receiving very considerable Additions.

Scottish Provident

ESTABLISHED 1837 Institution INCORPORATED 1848

THE SURPLUS at the latest Investigation was £1,581,000.

Over 60 per cent. of the Members who died during the Septennium were entitled to Bonuses which, notwithstanding that the Premiums do not as a rule exceed the non-profit rates of other Offices, were, on the average, equal to an addition of over 50 per cent. to the Original Assurances.

EXAMPLES OF PREMIUMS FOR £100 AT DEATH (WITH PROFITS).
